Industrial vehicles, such as fork lift trucks, tractors, wheel loaders, and backhoes, perform a variety of tasks, often in confined spaces. In general, industrial vehicles are specialized vehicles with simple mechanical designs, which are driven by engines, typically combustion engines. Due to their specialized design, industrial vehicles are typically manufactured in a limited number of models. Industrial vehicles are not designed to operate in agricultural, mining, and construction equipment operations. As a result, industrial vehicles are typically not suited for, and therefore not used in, performing many industrial vehicle tasks. In many situations, the capabilities of an industrial vehicle are limited to the tasks that the industrial vehicle can perform. In other words, many tasks are not possible due to the vehicle's design. For example, industrial vehicles are not typically designed to operate in material handling, towing, digging, loading and unloading operations, or any other operation which is performed inside of the vehicle, such as in the vehicle's body, tires, chassis, or buckets. In some situations, the tasks that are possible are limited to the tasks that the vehicle can perform by virtue of the user's skill level. In addition, having multiple specialized industrial vehicles is often required for performing certain tasks due to the complexities associated with coordinating the various tasks performed by the different specialized industrial vehicles. For example, when moving heavy equipment inside of a building or other structure, such as moving a crane, backhoe, forklift, or loader into a particular location, it is often necessary to coordinate the movements of the various vehicles. In conventional industrial vehicles, it can often take an operator of the industrial vehicle a significant amount of time to load and unload the vehicle, assemble or disassemble the vehicle,
