Google has reportedly laid off 175 employees in its cloud computing division and slashed its staff by another 20 in the past two weeks, according to Wired. The news follows an announcement that Google is selling its streaming music unit, which is understood to have been one of the companies hardest hit by the downturn in the music industry. The recent job cuts come in tandem with a growing speculation that Google is preparing to launch its own mobile phone, as seen in the recent introduction of Google’s Android operating system. Wired cites sources as saying that Google employees were advised to meet individually with their managers to discuss layoff plans. The office cuts are understood to include staff in the division responsible for its Cloud infrastructure, the blog said, but the source did not specify the number of people losing their jobs. With revenues already collapsing this year, analysts continue to downplay hopes that Google’s cloud-computing division – which does not include search and ads – would make a significant impact in the future. Google is cutting the number of employees in its cloud computing division (the sector in which it rents out its infrastructure and services) by around 30 per cent and has also slashed its staff by around 20 per cent in the past two weeks, Wired said. According to the blog, these latest job cuts follow the February lay-offs of at least 40 software engineers in a single day. Google’s cloud-computing business is a fraction of the size of its search and ads operations, with the estimates being that the division contributes around $1.5 billion to Google’s annual revenue. Google’s stock market value is around $600 billion, making it by far the most profitable US company, with a market capitalisation of more than $400 billion. Wired noted that the recent job cuts and staff 82138339de
