Breast cancer is a heterogeneous disease and it is thus difficult to draw conclusions about the effectiveness of anticancer drugs from one clinical trial to the next. The combination of tamoxifen and chemotherapy has been shown to significantly increase disease-free survival in patients with node-positive disease. However, the comparative effectiveness of other combination chemotherapy with both tamoxifen and other cytotoxic agents has been less convincingly established, and the role of chemotherapy in women with estrogen receptor-negative tumors remains to be defined. The theoretical and practical advantages of combining some hormonal manipulations (eg, estrogens, luteinizing hormone releasing hormone, opiates) with endocrine therapies, such as aromatase inhibitors, have yet to be thoroughly explored in the adjuvant setting, but these trials are now in progress. We review the current status of trials combining endocrine and cytotoxic agents in the treatment of women with estrogen receptor-positive tumors.
