I'm studying immigration law and I'm having some difficulty understanding what the difference is between a citizen, a foreigner and a legal permanent resident. All three appear to be an individual who has been granted access to the country by the government. In the British case, I know that a citizen is given the right to vote and be called up for jury duty. A legal permanent resident is granted access to the country, but I'm unsure as to whether they automatically have these rights. A foreigner is also granted access, but they are treated differently. They are not allowed to become citizens, but they are free to move about the country on a visa. Can someone provide me with clarity on the differences? A: "Citizen" is a term of nationality. You are considered a citizen of the country where you have been born, lived for some time, or have been naturalised. "Legal Permanent Resident" (LPR) is a term of immigration. An LPR is a permanent resident of a country, who can live and work within the country without visa. "Foreigner" is a term of immigration. An immigrant from outside a country, who has settled permanently in the country. Pleasantville Middle School Welcome Welcome to Pleasantville Middle School!
