Need For Speed - Underground 2 (Reloaded) India

these opinions tend to vary somewhat by faction (hostile aliens, alliance defenders, and the autobots vs. decepticons) with some factions having less of a problem with them. enemy factions are potentially more helpful for keeping yourself together but can also cause issues when things go wrong. every faction provides a different type of threat; losing a squad can be devastating in one faction and totally fruitless in another. a shortcoming of the latter is if your enemy is reluctant to engage you, you could be sitting at high-alert (possibly actively begging for a fight) for days waiting for them to make a mistake. the game has what's called a "sci-fi highlighting system". in which, if the high ground is warded and the player is positioned near it. in order to get to them, the player can use an instant "rewind of 20 seconds" effect to stop time, run up to the warded point, wait five seconds, and then run back down the slope to the point at which they had just stopped time. the effect resets if the character loses his position in the warded area. this system was introduced in the highly violent environment of the first need for speed. the player had the ability to slow the game down to resemble real-life while driving, running, jumping, and so on. this was a game mechanic introduced by criterion games where they wanted players to feel like they were actually in the cars. a great mechanic for real-life is real-time but the system is less-than-optimal in a game due to the fact that you could conceivably break your controller as well as kill you. the torpedo technology had continued improving. in wwii, you could get torpedoes that would cut through a thin metal section of ship at a range of 200 to 400 ft. in wwii, these were called "fish", which was also the nickname of the new version. they were accompanied by a new weapon, the depth charge, which was dropped ahead of the fish and exploded when it hit the water, which caused huge damage to a ship if set off at the right depth. in wwii, the depth charge was still cumbersome, and was rarely used, the fish's "stinger" was more accurate, it was faster and it was shorter, meaning it could be fired at a shorter distance before having to reload and still hit the target. however, it was still too long.

theres little real point in trying to adjust the formula to getting the best of all three cars given that theres only so much room to make each one better at the things its really good at. rebalance doesnt mean balance, so "adjusting the formula" to get more of the best car for each map means that one car will inevitably beat the other two in the things its less good at. there are still places where youll want one car more than the other, however. the car is generally faster in open country, with the added advantage of a rough ride. it will win most chases, and will be much more comfortable on rainy days. its also much more preferable to buy and drive. you can get one of each car for 3 credits, but theyre only worth about 1 if youre not actively invested in the game. the muscle car looks good, but its only real advantage is in forested areas where the bumpers only get banged up so much - which is more of a fluff advantage that allows you to run over trees that are likely to be there anyway. the street racer is fun and tough, but only serves as a novelty in the early game. its most effective use is in the second half, when it becomes so much faster than the other two that it pulls off all the harder races even though it never really changes. its also a lot more expensive than the other two cars. the "local" underground races are actually plot-relevant events that are necessary to get through the game as an npc. they are extremely rare, however, and theres a very good chance that youll never see one. these are things only gurus will know, and what they are depends on the map. i wont list them here. here is a list of what ive beaten, and the map they occur in.
